Re: What are the Terms of Service for Your Private Universe?

I'm not sure what to ask, it's all overwhelming and I sense the answers will be similar to any other.

If I had any question it would be what would the best question to ask?

If you want to build a house, make a guitar, or go on a holiday, you will need to ask dozens, maybe hundreds of sub questions.

Where can I buy pickups, how can I wire a pickup, etc.

The first step is to get comfortable and healthy in this reality, so you have time to plot an escape.

One good general question is to ask friends and trusted contacts:

"Have you seen The Truman Show/Severance? Do you think that could be real? If you were stuck in The Truman Show/Severance, how would you escape?"

Questions like that have opened up many mind-blowing conversations over the last two years with "normal looking" people around me.

If you ask an NPC what they ate for breakfast, they will tell you.

If you ask an NPC how to escape from this world, they may start to tell you too.

Everyone is looking for The Next Clue on their adventure.

Free-will. They can't suggest anything to you. They can only answer the big questions if you ask.

You may want to be stuck here.

If you "sense the answers will be similar to any other" it may mean you don't value people's advice, and/or you lack the will to implement it. Which may mean you'll be stuck a while.
Im half-stuck for similar reasons.

Being too proud to ask questions is a major, often fatal flaw. It is, in fact, one of the biggest blind spots which keeps most people stuck.

If one wanted to simply manifest that guitar out of thin air, without knowing the intricate details, how would that be done? Is that possible? The blueprints for the guitar are already 'out there' somewhere, possibly within the subconscious of all of us even.

Do not mention the name of my tribe, or you will be removed from my private universe.

Well yes, technically, you could. I don't have those skills, to literally make a guitar appear from nowhere. But I'm sure some can do it.

In the etheric realms, that would be easy. Here, less so...

More realistically, you could focus your Imagination and Will on the right guitar for you. Then, you may see one in your price range, in a second hand shop or guitar store. Or your friend could give you one within a week. That is easily possible. Why not be pragmatic and take that path?

~O~

Furniture often gets left out on the street here. When I need something, it often appears on the street within a week or two. So I manifested it.

When people ask me where I got it from, I say "God dropped it out of the sky." ha.

~O~

This is a physical world, so there are some manifestation restraints. These restraints exist for a reason. What if you annoyed a shopkeeper, and they could use the power of their mind to manifest a rash on your skin, as you walked away from their shop?

Would you want to live in that world?

Where curses are sold on every street corner, and cost 5 silver coins a throw...

~O~

Magic has a good and dark side.

Some say we decided to come here, to The Land Of No Magic, because magic was harming as much as it was helping.

Your question may imply you want the end result without putting in The Work. Who doesn't daydream? But The Journey is important too.

That's why Asia is winning now. because they put in the physical work. Whitey (many, but not all) has become indolent. That's maybe a result of stuffing up with carbs three times a day. Bread is deadly.

Im Caucasian, from London.

Accept where you are for now, and do The Work. Im making up for lost time now. Friday night, sat in learning Chinese, cos I was too lazy to knuckle down when I first got here.

~O~

We idolize rock stars and bodybuilders because they are Living Sacrifices. Sons and Daughters of Discipline.
