GLP Javascript Helpdesk. How May we Help You? ((Can we write some Javascript/JQuery to stop the double posting on the submit button?))

Three lines of JQuery, mods. We can help if you like.

$( 'form' ).submit(function(){
  $( 'input[type=submit]', this ).attr( 'disabled', 'disabled' );
});

Disclaimer:

This only works when javascript is enabled on the user's browser. If the data that's being submitted is critical (like a credit card purchase), then consider my solution as only the first line of defense. For many use cases though, disabling the submit button will provide enough prevention.

I would implement this javascript-only solution first. Then track how many duplicate records are still getting created. If it's zero (or low enough to not care), then you're done. If it's too high for you, then implement a back-end database check for an existing record.

Just inspected element and saw they already have an old JQuery library as a dependency. Version 1.6.2, from 2011.

Re: GLP Javascript Helpdesk. How May we Help You? ((Can we write some Javascript/JQuery to stop the double posting on the submit button?))

So how big is local RAM storage on the average phone? I want to load some news links on a Google sheet as a JSON object. This'll give me a volatile but ultrafast latest news database that the user can access at high speed. How big can a single JSON object loaded into RAM be, if I want to follow Android and iOS best practices? Could I get away with 100MB if I garbage collected alright? This is all new to me.

I dunno if you're being sarcastic or not. I don't want to be a jerk and use too much RAM. I don't use mobiles, so I know nothing about them. I know phones are getting more powerful every year.

Look at what I'm doing here. Articles load lightning fast, as soon as the user starts typing.

[\[link to kalki.surge.sh\(secure\)\]](https://kalki.surge.sh(secure))

My web-app works better on desktop. I'm learning to scrape now. I can make the RAM DB as small as 30MB, or go up to 1GB. It all depends on current memory allocation limits. I can research it, but wondered if anyone more experienced had any ideas.

I guess on desktops I have much more freedom.

Re: GLP Javascript Helpdesk. How May we Help You? ((Can we write some Javascript/JQuery to stop the double posting on the submit button?)) shoot for as little as neccessary while keeping speed as fast as possible.a small ram means faster request.

 at 50mb apk size,most smart phones start seeing performance issues and the heavy load of stored bloatware isnt dumped fast enough.
 cookies etc,eating up bandwidth,pennies at a time.
 when building anything,lite is rite.dump old files as soon as process ends.

small files operating that are hacked will see performance issues immediately,big files do not.

thats why i like superlite browsers,sure they are easy to backdoor but i also notice the moment that backdoor is opened.

That's good advice, cheers. I agree lite + minimal is popular. I'm going to have

- no tracking
- minimal to no cookies
- Very few photos.

I'm keeping it text only. I realized I can index just the url/title, and 2 short paragraphs from each article in the RAM database.

I dunno, I tested it on a couple of ladies, and they thought the offline browsing was cool. Google is a RAM hog cos of all the spying they do. That's now well known.

I figure if I can keep 1000 breaking news/general interest articles stored in a JSON object that instantly loads, users are gonna be intrigued, liberated and happy. Then I can figure out service workers and update 2-4 times a day. Users will have a breaking news database on their phone, even with no signal.

Cheers. Hope you stick around.

Angular with NgRx for a very large enterprise front end has been great for us. Productivity is off the charts.

React was alright and vue.js was as well, but Angular takes a lot of the arguing out of it for you and let's you just get a lot of shit done.

if hes building a newsboard, forget it. its all from same pit of shit and the boards just brand it and shuffle it.

aps that give back control of a smartphone without rooting is the pinnacle of godhood in programming. you break google, the world is your oyster. you provide real blockage of keystroke views and real encrypted data on blockchain that runs a voice and picture mode. then run this through bluetooth bump as the only way to join the blockchain. all while blocking all 2g and 911 backdoor hacks, you got a solid apk. if you are really evil, you put in a man in the middle catcher that runs a background check and gps on the thug.
